Body strength profile of elderly black and white Americans. There is increasing evidence that resistance exercises are effective for preserving muscle strength in middle-aged and older individuals and for preventing the loss of muscle mass with age. Because aging is associated with a loss of muscle strength as well as with increased body fat, it is important to identify safe and effective resistance exercise programs that can be used by older adults. The purpose of this study was to assess the body strength profile of elderly black and white men and women. Body weights and submaximal, isokinetic strength (leg extension, leg flexion, leg press, and leg curl) were measured for 24 elderly men and women. The research was conducted in December 1992 and December 1993 in 2 community centers in Boston, Massachusetts. Subjects were drawn from the Boston University Longitudinal Study on Aging. The sample included 10 white men, mean age 77 yr (SD 5), who were residents of a senior center; 10 black women, mean age 78 yr (SD 6), who were residents of an Alameda County senior center; 8 white women, mean age 72 yr (SD 5), who were participants of the University of Michigan's Gerontology Research Center; and 4 black men, mean age 75 yr (SD 5), who were employees of the university. Isokinetic leg strength was measured at 60 degrees/sec. Leg extensor and flexor strength were significantly related to age, but there were no differences between black and white men. Leg press strength was significantly related to leg curl strength, and to leg press and leg curl speed in men and leg extension and leg curl strength in women. Body weight was not significantly related to leg extension and flexor strength, but was significantly related to leg press and leg curl strength in men. Leg press power was related to leg extension and leg flexor strength and was not significantly related to leg press speed in either men or women. The findings from this study suggest that leg extensions and flexors contribute approximately 25% of leg press strength and that leg press speed is most important for leg press power production. The data suggest that the leg press may be the most appropriate exercise for addressing issues of muscle mass preservation and maintenance of strength in elderly black and white men and women. -3' (reverse), and PRPF3 (forward) 5'-GAGCATTGCCTTTGTCATCTTT-3' (reverse).
